Not illustrated. 1887 Excerpt: .Much business of a necessary, but not of an interesting, kind is frequently transacted when most of the people s representatives have gone home to dine. Estimates which are not seriously opposed have at times an amazing faculty of getting voted in an empty house. Those who have left at eight o clock return at half-past ten to find vote after vote passed and the expenditure of millions sanctioned. These considerations and others must have their effect when this question of adjourning for dinner is discussed. It might perhaps be worth consideration whether divisions should be taken or the House counted out between seven o clock and nine; but it is doubtful, very doubtful, whether it is wise to excise, even by a sessional order, two hours from every day s work. Consequently upon the change of hours, the committee have recommended a form of closure...
