Hush, Sarah! exclaimed old Jacob Bond, as he sat up in his bed, while the wind clattered and whistled through the shivering window frames. Hush! Is that Brindles bark No, father; it is one of the farm dogs near the village. Lie down, dearest father; it is a cold night, and you are trembling. I dont know why I should feel cold, Sarah, he replied, pointing his shadowy fingers towards the grate, where an abundant fire blazed; I am sure you have put down as much wood as would roast an ox. It is so very cold, father. Still, we must not be wasteful, Sarah, he answered; wilful waste makes woful want. Sarah Bond covered the old man carefully over, while he laid himself stiffly down upon his pallet, re-muttering his favourite proverb over and over again. She then drew the curtains more closely, and seated herself in an old-fashioned chair beside a little table in front of the fire. The room had been the drawing-room of the old house in which Mr. Bond and his daughter resided, but for the sake of saving both labour and expense, he had had his bed removed into it; and though anything but comfortable, a solitary, impoverished, and yet gorgeous appearance pervaded the whole, such as those who delineate interiors, loving small lights and deep shadows, would covet to convey to their canvass. The bed upon which the old man lay was canopied, and of heavy crimson damask. In the dim light of that spacious room, it looked to the worn-out eyes of Sarah Bond more like a hearse than a bed. Near it was an old spinnet, upon which stood...
